

Leidos National Security Expert Discusses Critical Infrastructure at Eisenhower Institute

November 2, 2015

(Reston, Va.) November 2, 2015 – Senior Vice President and Chief Systems Architect Rob Zitz of Leidos will speak on the panel on Domestic and International Energy Policy to be held November 3, 2015 at the Eisenhower Institute at Gettysburg College, Gettysburg, PA.

Rob Zitz is a former deputy undersecretary of preparedness at the Department of Homeland Security and is a 32-year veteran of the intelligence community. An expert on critical infrastructure, cybersecurity and terrorism, Zitz will describe both physical and cyber risks and protection strategies. He will be joined on the panel by senior executives from the Department of Energy's National Nuclear Security Administration. The panel is the first in a three-panel series examining nuclear and non-nuclear strategy, policy and security.

Organized and presented by the Eisenhower Institute Undergraduate Fellows, the Domestic and International Energy Policy Panel of experts will examine energy policy from a national security and counter-terrorism perspective, exploring how energy infrastructure is threatened and protected in a time of increasing globalization.
