

Leidos hires Daryle Lademan to lead corporate strategy activities

March 31, 2025

RESTON, Va., March 31, 2025 /PRNewswire/ -- Leidos (NYSE: LDOS) is bringing on Daryle Lademan as its new senior vice president of corporate strategy, a role in which she'll lead company-level growth strategies, strategic partnerships and investments, strategy execution and special projects.

Starting today, Lademan reports to Chief Growth Officer Jason Albanese and will collaborate across the executive leadership team on annual and long-range plans that enable the company's new NorthStar 2030 strategy.

"Daryle's three decades of experience across the defense and government technology market makes her ideal to guide NorthStar 2030 implementation," Albanese said. "Our strategy's foundation is enabling smarter and more efficient outcomes. Daryle will help ensure we're pursuing priorities that result in tangible solutions for our customers."

Lademan spent 15 years at BAE Systems, Inc., before joining Leidos. Most recently, she led that company's U.S. strategy and planning at the enterprise level. Before that, she led those activities for that company's Electronic Systems and Support Solutions businesses. Prior to BAE Systems she was a principal at management consulting firm The Avascent Group (now part of Oliver Wyman) and a director at strategic advisory firm CSP Associates, Inc.

Lademan is a former president and board member of Women in Aerospace, which focuses on increasing the leadership capabilities of women in the industry, and has degrees from George Washington University and the University of Central Florida. She's also an avid runner who has completed 27 marathons.
